Сажетак предавања:

Nis can embrace an entrepreneurial spirit and have a long-term vision to contend with the global economic crisis according to leading international businessman Sir Paul Judge, chairman, British-Serbian Chamber of Commerce.

Sir Paul's comments will come during a lecture on globalisation at the University of Nis. With agribusiness a key sector in the Nis economy, the Londoner worked for Cadbury Schweppes, and led the buyout of its food arm to form Premier Brands.

He was subsequently chairman of Food From Britain, director general of the United Kingdom Conservative Party and ministerial adviser, and plays key roles in various organisations worldwide.

Sir Paul, president of the Chartered Institute of Marketing, believes that global headlines around Serbia often do not bode well for investors.

However, as part of the Chamber, he is working to offer his services to devise a long-term plan to aid economic growth in Serbia.

He thinks that Nis has always possessed a strong entrepreneurial spirit and strong manufacturing and agricultural base, but people in southern Serbia have to compete against places like Vietnam and China where exports can be made cheaper and faster.

Building on the values of tolerance and diversity promulgated by the Edict of Milan 1,700 years ago, young people from Nis can develop an understanding of the wider world and shape the economic future of Nis to become more attractive to foreign investors, and identify global markets for goods and services from Nis.

Nis is working hard to enhance its education system, infrastructure and can boast an attractive cost of living.
